To determine if gingival prostaglandins are involved in cyclic leukocytosis, the concentration of prostaglandins E and F in the gingival crevicular fluid (GCF) of patients with periodontitis and of controls was measured by RIA. The concentration of PGE was found to be significantly lower in the GCF of periodontitis patients, who exhibited a marked cyclic leukocytosis, than in that of periodontally healthy subjects. The PGF levels were higher in GCF samples from the patients with periodontitis than in control samples. The present data indicate that the PGE level in the GCF of periodontitis patients may be lower than that in periodontally healthy subjects and that PGF levels might play a role in the cyclic leukocytosis observed in these patients. The induction of tumor growth by H-ras oncogene-activated fibroblasts, C3H10T1/2 mouse embryonic fibroblasts, transfected with an activated mutant of the H-ras oncogene, show an enhanced proliferative capacity and an increased production of ras-activated protein kinase (pp60src). A DMBA mammary carcinoma-derived fibroblast cell line (MCF-7) transfected with a normal ras-encoding gene shows a decreased growth rate, and a low level of pp60src activity, compared to the control MCF-7 cell line transfected with the neomycin resistance gene. Transfection with the activated H-ras oncogene in association with the neomycin resistance gene in the MCF-7 cells led to the formation of colonies when cells were subjected to a soft agar growth assay in vitro. The H-ras-transfected MCF-7 cells do not induce the formation of colonies in vivo. Tumor growth and metastasis are the result of the interaction between tumor cells and the host st 3da54e8ca3
