(2011) The iPhone 4/3G was the last smartphone that was successfully rooted by the time we reviewed it. Now, with the iPhone 6/6 Plus and iPhone 5s/5c, the rooting world is ready to eat any new iPhone. A portion of the new-iPhone horde have been slipping their tell-tale jailbreak-less signatures into the system. The only readily available option for a non-jailbroken jailbreak installation right now is from the (relatively) new and hard-to-get developers version of Redsn0w. Apple has successfully blocked Redsn0w from forwarding the new iPads into the wild, but for those wishing to partake in the network on the cusp of iOS 7's release, the update is out there. Eager to test out the newly rooted device? Who better than Ars to get both of you to the edge? We spent several days each in the hands of the iPhone 6 Plus and iPhone 5s/5c un-jailbroken, and attempted to max out both devices in terms of processing, RAM, and storage. We're posting the results of the tests here in the hopes that other members of the community can try their hand at putting the worlds best hardware through its paces. For those who aren't aware of what a jailbreak is, it's an exploit in the hardware of the device that bypasses Apple's Secure Enclave, allowing the device to operate outside of Apple's terms-and-conditions. For iPhone applications, the end result is an unrestricted experience: you can install or modify any app available anywhere in the world. That's a much-needed feature for an Apple device. Meet the End-Points To rule out any sort of hardware errors or software issues contributing to the performance of the device, we opted to install an additional $100 to the test rack. If the resulting processing power was clearly an issue, we'd mark that as a win for the iPhone. The total cost of the test was $450. We figured that having an additional $500-700 lying around for spending money would represent fair value for a week or two of total test time. To test the underpinnings of where the simulation was initially going to reach, we first started off running an uncontaminated App Store 60 test cycle.

The test cycle consists of running various other apps, throwing a few at the device to see how that affects the experience. First, the app

Photo from NASA via Flickr cc/Jeff Erikson When the tropical cyclone 'Chris' made landfall in South Australia, temperatures in the region fell by almost 15 degrees in just 20 hours. While it is Australia's desert and we all know that it is always 'hot' (around 40C/70F) in the summer months, it is the extreme rise in temperatures when developing tropical cyclone makes its' landfall that makes it particularly notable. Parts of South Australia experienced a huge temperature drop even when the wind is calm. Photo Courtesy: Weatherzone. When a tropical cyclone makes landfall, it causes a 'change in wind shear that drops temperatures in the inland behind the cyclone by up to 15 degrees. All this, combined with a lot of sunshine and hot, dry winds (kangaroo murals FTW) from the southeastern tip of the country - makes for some pretty eye-opening photos. Here are some of the most striking: "Warm temperatures and wind shear lows combined with an influx of sunny skies can efficiently cool the back half of the continent when Tropical Cyclone Chris settled its' weight onto the SA coast," says meteorologist Claire Robison of Weatherzone. "Not just that, the change in wind shear and to-ing and fro-ing has a profound effect on storm-driven clouds. As the wind shear relaxes, the clouds expand away from the storm, creating a region of clear skies over inland SA. "The reduced temperature gradient even into the cloudy interior means the effect of the warm, dry wind is nullified," she says. "Rain or showers don't occur over the SA interior to any great extent and it stays dry well inland. By switching on the high-pressure system over New Zealand overnight, the severe winds of the tropical cyclone onshore have been replaced by a weak wind flow from the southwest." "Combining the two effects of reduced temperature and winds implies the temperature over the interior region is roughly 15 degrees cooler than before the cyclone as it crossed the coast." It is of course still very warm in the arid inland - but much more enjoyable than it was for people living in the sticks.
